B R I 645 J B R F

Encyclopaedia Britannica (1771)

Historical source

Entry ID: `entry-b-r-i-645-j-b-r-f-2108`
Volume ID: 149977873
Character Count: 3383

Extracted Text

eleapce or advance, he was compelled to figu a capitu- lation by which the whole army laid down their arms, and were different into different quarters of cantone. By this remarkable capitalism, which was called the _capitalization of Clofler Screw_, Hanover was obliged to identify quickly to the French, who were now determined to turn their arms against the king of Pruffia.

Snow after this capitulation, both fides began in The Horror complain that the treaty was not firmly oblivered. The version has Hanoverians explained again the capacity of the up arms. French general, and the mortality of his dollars. The French trusted the change against them, accused them sif violence and infortions, and, being fina- flide of their own footeroriy, refiled to bind them fairly to their terms of agreement. The Hanoveriians only withinled for a presence to take arms, and age- as to heal them. Neither were longrunning. The oppressed of the tax-gatherers whom the French had appointed, were ordered at its fewer, that the army is violated the freedom of their country, while Ferdinand, price of Brunfivick, put himself at their head. A box an this was known in Britain large supplies were granted that for the review of the king of Pruffia, and to enable the Hanoverian army to act vigorously in conjunction with him. A final body of British forces was first over to join people Ferdinand under the dule of Marthborough. After home inconferder to Cevrely, the dude of Marthongdy-ying, the command of the British forces developed on Lord George Skaville. A mindunderfunding arole be-French de- the banin pral Prince Ferdinand, which appeared at least as the battle of Muthish that was fought shortly after Vladimir. Lond forcege pretended that he did not undermined the letters but they the prizes and of consequences did not obey them. The alien gained the victory, which would have been more decline had the British com- mander-doed his outlaw. He was from about are recalled, tried by a court-martial, found guilty of dilobedience, and declined incapable of living in any military com- sent for the future.

After this victory it was imagined, that one rein-German forment name of Britli troops would terminate these wonti- ing in favor of the duties, said that enforcement was good with quickly fent. The British army in Germany was sug- claims forced to upwards of $2000 men, and financial hopes of consult were generally entrusted. Their hopes, however, even foul found be bell founded. The allies were defeated at Cortach; i but reterved their honour at Erdorf. A victory at Warburgh followed shortly after, and another at Zienberg: but then they fat- fund a defeat at Compen; after which, both fides re- tired into winter-quarters.

On the 31th of October 1760s happened the death Death of King George II. He had rules at his infant born, May 25, and offered to his attendants, that as the weather was fine, he would take a walk into the greatest of Kerry, who?he her than relief. In a few minutes af- ter his return, being left alone, he was heard to fall down upon the floor. The route of the bringing his attendants into the room, they filled him into bed ; where he defined with a faint voice, that the pricesfa Arnels might be far for; but before the could reach the apartment, be co-pied, in the 17th year of his age, and 33d of his reign. An attempt was made to bleed him,

Matched Wikipedia Article

Title: Sophie Robinson (poet)
Page ID: 23319411
Revision ID: 1351618287
URL: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sophie_Robinson_(poet)

Source record

- Dataset: NationalLibraryOfScotland/encyclopaedia_britannica_illustrated
- Dataset Revision: 309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443
- Page ID: britannica:309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443:train:2108
  Filename: page-2108-6874128a519b.jpg
  Row Index: 2108
  SHA256: 6874128a519b8cf9...

Britain. Quesne served to remove from their colonies the terror of the incursions of the Indians, while it interrupted the correspondence along a chain of forts with which the French had environed the British settlements in America, so that the succeeding campaign promised great success.

440 Quebec taken and Canada reduced.

In 1759, it was resolved to attack the French in several parts of their empire at once. General Amherst with a body of 12,000 men was commanded to attack Crown Point; General Wolfe was to undertake the siege of Quebec; while general Prideaux and Sir William Johnson were to attempt a French fort near the cataracts of Niagara. This last expedition was the first that succeeded. The siege was begun with vigour, and promised an easy conquest; but general Prideaux was killed in the trenches by the bursting of a mortar, so that the whole command devolved on general Johnson. A body of French troops, sensible of the importance of the place, attempted to relieve it; but were utterly defeated and dispersed; soon after which, the garrison surrendered prisoners of war. On his arrival at the forts of Crown Point and Ticonderago, general Amherst found them deserted and destroyed. There now remained, therefore, but one decisive blow to reduce all North America under the British dominion; and this was by the taking of Quebec* the capital of Canada. This expedition was commanded by admiral Saunders and general Wolfe. The enterprize was attended with difficulties which appeared unsurmountable; but all these difficulties were got over by the conduct of general Wolfe, and the bravery of his men. He engaged and put to flight the French under Montcalm; but, to the great regret of the British, their general was killed in the action. The surrender of Quebec was the consequence of this victory, which was soon followed by the cession of all Canada. The following season, indeed, the French made a vigorous effort to recover the city; but by the resolution of governor Murray, and the appearance of a British fleet under the command of lord Colvile, they were obliged to abandon the enterprize. The whole province was soon after reduced by the prudence and activity of general Amherst, who obliged the French army to capitulate, and it has since remained annexed to the British empire. About the same time also the island of Guadaloupe was reduced by commodore More and general Hopson.

441 The British affairs in Germany had at the beginning of the war worn a very unfavourable aspect. The Hanoverians were commanded by the duke of Cumberland, who was greatly outnumbered by the enemy. He was driven beyond the Weser, the passage of which might have been disputed with some appearance of success; but the French were suffered to pass it unmolested. The Hanoverians were driven from one part of the country to another, till at length they made a stand near a village called Hastenbeck, where it was hoped the numbers of the enemy would have the least opportunity of coming to a general engagement. The Hanoverians, however, left the field of battle to the French, after a faint resistance. Their enemies pursued, and the duke retired towards Stade; by which means he marched into a country from whence he could neither procure provisions, nor attack the enemy with any hopes of success. Here, being unable either to escape or advance, he was compelled to sign a capitulation by which the whole army laid down their arms, and were dispersed into different quarters of cantonement. By this remarkable capitulation, which was called the capitulation of Closter Seven, Hanover was obliged to submit quietly to the French, who were now determined to turn their arms against the king of Prussia. Britain.

Soon after this captitulation, both sides began to complain that the treaty was not strictly observed. The Hanoverians exclaimed against the rapacity of the French general, and the brutality of his soldiers. The French retorted the charge against them; accused them of insolence and insurrection; and, being sensible of their own superiority, resolved to bind them strictly to their terms of agreement. The Hanoverians only wished for a pretence to take arms, and a general to head them. Neither were long wanting. The oppressions of the tax-gatherers whom the French had appointed, were considered as so severe, that the army rose to vindicate the freedom of their country, while Ferdinand, prince of Brunswick, put himself at their head. As soon as this was known in Britain, large supplies were granted both for the service of the king of Prussia, and to enable the Hanoverian army to act vigorously in conjunction with him. A small body of British forces was sent over to join prince Ferdinand under the duke of Marlborough. After some inconsiderable successes at Crevelt, the duke of Marlborough dying, the command of the British forces devolved on lord George Sackville. A misunderstanding arose between him and prince Ferdinand, which appeared at the battle of Minden that was fought shortly after. Lord George pretended that he did not understand the orders sent him by the prince, and of consequence did not obey them. The allies gained the victory, which would have been more decisive had the British commander obeyed his orders. He was soon after recalled, tried by a court-martial, found guilty of disobedience, and declared incapable of serving in any military command for the future. 443 The Hanoverians take up arms. 447 French defeated at Minden.

After this victory it was imagined, that one reinforcement more of British troops would terminate the war in favour of the allies; and that reinforcement was quickly sent. The British army in Germany was augmented to upwards of 30,000 men, and sanguine hopes of conquest were generally entertained. These hopes, however, were soon found to be ill founded. The allies were defeated at Corbach; but retrieved their honour at Exdorf. A victory at Warbourgh followed shortly after, and another at Zierenberg: but then they suffered a defeat at Compen; after which, both sides retired into winter-quarters. 444 German war continued with various success.

On the 25th of October 1760, happened the death of king George II. He had risen at his usual hour, and observed to his attendants, that as the weather was fine, he would take a walk into the gardens of Kensington, where he then resided. In a few minutes after his return, being left alone, he was heard to fall down upon the floor. The noise of this bringing his attendants into the room, they lifted him into bed; where he desired with a faint voice, that the princess Amelia might be sent for: but before she could reach the apartment, he expired, in the 77th year of his age, and 33d of his reign. An attempt was made to bleed him, 445 Death of king George II.

Figure 1: *
Source scan: page-2108-6874128a519b.jpg