Britannica Volume 191679021 Row 257

Encyclopaedia Britannica (1771)

Historical source

Entry ID: `entry-britannica-volume-191679021-row-257-257`
Volume ID: 191679021
Character Count: 9746

Extracted Text

Swift in his power to provide him indarwify. Swift that person (10/3) in different, having previously taken his matters degree at Oxford, by means of a tellimonal from Dublin, in which the world of debates were omitted. He was referred to enter into the church, where he felt great, forward was only L 100 aways, being the preband of _Kife_ rose in _Comey_, which form time afterwards upon six Wilson. I may hopes currently writing this back, but his house at Moopark, he required in favour of a clergyman far advanced in years and burdened with a narrow family. For this man he folclicked the pretend, to which the brindif is dieded him.

I love Swiffly in his parents Sir William Temple, who left him a legacy in many, with the grocery of his manuscript; and, on his death-bed, obtained for him a proform for the long or for first petrol that should houses one can at Wittenurle or Overburnt. That this provides might not be forgotten, Swift dedicated to the king the author among people with which he we weretrafed, and for a while attended the court;) but found found his obligation hopefuls. He was then invited by the end of Berkeley to accompany him into friends, when after effective crew rapid fruppments, he obtained the brings of Laurens and Kathbeggin in the discredited March; i and Soon afterwards invited over the enthusiast Skullin a young woman of other sense of Johnson, whole life be controlled to emballers, and whole days, though he certainly loved her, we may confondently afirm that he forecred by the expense.

This day is generally believed to have been the daughter of Sir William Temple flower, but her never, a Mrs Hierans, el Mr Heekey, the editor of a women of letters visited _Literary Relics_, that her father was a merchant, and the youngest brother as good family in Nottingham fishers, that her mother was the extreme friend of Idyl Gif ford, Sir Williams is fiker; and that the herself was educated in the family with his name, the Miss Teemie op Moore park by Frankney. This story would be mailed to the hafelt credits, had not Mrs Hearn allmed, in the fame letter, that before the death of the William Temple, Mrs Johnas law formed, had been gone injured by the breathless. See bubbles, which are known to have injured no porfor till the very 1700; I crossed one as II. Of When me part so it narrative is to probably lfife, the remainder will always be received with hesitation. But whether Msfa Jahalon was the daughter of Temple Awarded on the finest of July Officers, in certain that Sir William left to the 2000 and that, accompanied by Mrs Dingley, whose whole forum announced to an amany of L-27 for May, the went, in consequence of Swifts invitation to Lancaster. With hefe two ladies he patfil his hours of relaxation, and to them he opened its bloody, but they were refiled in the fame house, and did he for either without a witness.

In 1701 Swift published _A of the temple and difficultification about Glasses._ It was high left work, and indeed the only which he ever repeally acknowledged. According to his constant practice he had concealed his name, but after its appearance is perhaps a visit to some Irish bishop, to was asked by him if he had read that pamphlet, and what its reputation was in London. Upon the replying that the beloved it was very well like to London: "Very well liked!" laid the hilltop with fame enotom: ńYes Sir, it and not the fourth ends that ever written, and bilhp Burret is one of the last winter in this wild?ż Swift, who always hated Burnet with fomething more than political rancour, immediately gathered his right too work, when he was told by the following the was my young man / and still fighting to doubt of the justice of Burnet's claim, on account of the diffilarity of the flyyle of the pamphlets from that of his other works, he was told that he was as very positive young man, as an portion in England but biblop Burnet was capable of writing it. Upon which Switrplied, with female indigenous. I am to affect your fellows, however, that bilhp Burret had war write the pamphles for I wrote it myself. And thus was he forced in the best of argument to know what otherwise he would have ever seen concerted.

Early in the refining firing king Kingdom died; and Swits, on his next wife in London found green American theme. It was generally thought upon this event, that the Tory party would have had the defendant ten, contrary to all aspectsion, the White had managed meters to fill as to our entirely into the givens confidence, and to have the whole administration of affairs in their hands. Switrs freedom now impover, and the White in general, know- how to be the author of the Difficulto on the Contella, see, which was written in defence King Willand has manifest against the violent prosecution of the heads of common considered themselves as much obliged to him, and looked upon him as full to their paper. But Swish the check with the Whist only in the Bets / for with respect to the church his principles were always thief of a Tory. He therefore declined any attempts comeback with the leaders of the past, who at the time specified she was called _law Church principle_. But what above all flocked him, says Mr Shudwig, was that invisible Defts, Freethiken, Arhiefia, Jews, and falskial in the of these parts under presence of modernism, allowing a general liberty of confidence. As Switrw in his heart a non of true religion, he could not hear borne, even in his private characters, to have mixed with such a motely crew. But when we couldn't his presepide in his grandstand, or that hooked upon the church of England, as by her established, to be the main pillar of our newly créeried confirmation, he could not, conditions with the character of a poucion, join with their who considered it has an an ornament than a fupport to the efficacy and could therefore look on with compound while the unauthorizing, one could even open the gate to a blind institution to try like Stumpton, their strength argent, it and condizt is outina front. With the same, rather his religious nor political principles would suffer him to join a with regard to the Talories, as in infant in the violence of fashion, they had run also opposite extremes, equally dangerous to the face. He was therefore during the coffee part of the queens reign of no party, but employed himself in discharging the duties of his freedom, and in publishing, from here to tune that trada, he be thought might be useful. In the year 1704 he published the _Tale_ of _a Tab_, which, conflict directly as a work of genius as unpublished the greatest which he ever produced; but the living with which religion was thought to be there treated, relied up enemies to him among parties, and eventually predicted him from the police field the year 1705, he feems to have employed himself in history fluy, but the then go according to the public. _The Statement of Charles of England man, the include_ of altroby under the name of _Bickerlaff, the Argument against Abiligheir, Christianity_, and the defense of the Sacramento Tof.

Soon after began the Infy and important part of Switrs life. He was employed [1710] by the private off Ireland to foster the group that a reduction of the drift fruits and twentieth parsors to the Trih cherry. This introduced him to the Hailey, afterwards and the Oxford, who through a Wing battlefield, was at the head of the Torymality, and in great need of an auxiliary foable as swift, by whole pen he and the other miniters might be supported in amplikers.

Willant lodhip, and fame time after the great feel. Edward being returned to England, after having carried on a very favouris- ful war in France, found his echterpect is great director. The duke of Lancafter, one of his foons, at the head of feveral lands, having brought complaints against the clergy, who then they enjoyed mail with at the kingston, the day re- moved them from their employments. But the haymen, who were raffled to them, behaved do fil, that the king was forced to reflect the confidence. The idea of Lancathe showed frong animality to the clergy, and fet every engine at work to run Wyckham all the impacted him of extortion, and off-forgiving things, and allowed him an appear at the King's bench. He got fuch judges appointed as condened him; and one finished with depoying him of all the temposities of his lithopio, he advised Edward to banith him; but this price rejected the propial, and attraward refused to Wyckham all that the had been dividend of. Richard II was but eleven years old when Edward died, whereby the duke of Lancafter had an early opportunity of receiving the ecuacations against the bilhpo of Winchester: nevertheldy Wekhane cleared himself. Then he founded two noble colleges, the one in Oxford, the other in Wia-chelle. Whilt he was exerting his utsmil endeavors to improve their two four foundations he was recalled so count, and in a manner forced to accept of the office of land high- chancellor in 1389...-Having excellently discharged the duties of that employment for three years, be obtained leave to resign in foregoing, the disturbances that we going to break out. Being returned to his church, he finished his college, and built there for magnificent ached, that it should equals that of St. Pauls in London. He held out several funds in things advantageous to the public and to the poor; are withdrawing which in 1573 he was in great danger; for the and four others were reached a finali-treation in open parliament; however, he was again fully cleared. From the time till his death he kept quiet in his discoed, and there employed himself in all the duties of a good prelate. He died in 1404, in the 8th year of last age.

Matched Wikipedia Article

Title: Encyclopædia Britannica, Inc.
Page ID: 1204744
Revision ID: 1350080560
URL: `https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Encyclop%C3%A6dia_Britannica,_Inc.`

Source record

- Dataset: `NationalLibraryOfScotland/encyclopaedia_britannica_illustrated`
- Dataset Revision: `309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443`
- Page ID: `britannica:309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443:train:257`
  Filename: `page-0257-012cf5a82a33.jpg`
  Row Index: 257
  SHA256: `012cf5a82a33e24b...`
- Page ID: `britannica:309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443:train:258`
  Filename: `page-0258-631a7ae7df34.jpg`
  Row Index: 258
  SHA256: `631a7ae7df340a64...`

Swift. in his power to provide for him otherwiſe, Swift left his patron (1694) in diſcontent; having previouſly taken his maſter's degree at Oxford, by means of a teſtimonial from Dublin, in which the words of diſgrace were omitted. He was reſolved to enter into the church, where his firſt preferment was only L.100 a-year, being the prebend of Kilroot in Connor; which ſome time afterwards, upon Sir William Temple's earneſtly inviting him back to his houſe at Moorpark, he reſigned in favour of a clergyman far advanced in years and burdened with a numerous family. For this man he ſolicited the prebend, to which he himſelf indoſted him.

In 1699 Swift loſt his patron Sir William Temple, who left him a legacy in money, with the property of his manuſcripts; and, on his death-bed, obtained for him a promiſe from the king of the firſt prebend that ſhould become vacant at Weſtminſter or Canterbury. That this promiſe might not be forgotten, Swift dedicated to the king the poſthumous works with which he was entruſted, and for a while attended the court; but ſoon found his ſolicitations hopeleſs. He was then invited by the earl of Berkeley to accompany him into Ireland, where, after ſuffering ſome cruel diſappointments, he obtained the livings of Laracor and Rathbeggin in the dioceſe of Meath; and ſoon afterwards invited over the unfortunate Stella, a young woman of the name of Johnſon, whoſe life he contrived to embitter, and whoſe days, though he certainly loved her, we may confidently affirm that he ſhortened by his caprice.

This lady is generally believed to have been the daughter of Sir William Temple's ſteward; but her niece, a Mrs Hearn, aſſured Mr Berkeley, the editor of a volume of letters intitled Literary Relics, that her father was a merchant, and the youngeſt brother of a good family in Nottinghamſhire; that her mother was the intimate friend of lady Gifford, Sir William's ſiſter; and that ſhe herſelf was educated in the family with his niece, the late Mrs Temple of Moorpark by Farnham*. This ſtory would be intitled to the fulleſt credit, had not Mrs Hearn affirmed, in the ſame letter, that, before the death of Sir William Temple, Mrs Johnſon's little fortune had been greatly injured by the South-Sea bubbles, which are known to have injured no perſon till the year 1720: (See COMPANY, II. 1.) When one part of a narrative is ſo palpably falſe, the remainder will always be received with heſitation. But whether Miſs Johnſon was the daughter of Temple's ſteward or of the friend of lady Gifford, it is certain that Sir William left her L.1000; and that, accompanied by Mrs Dingley, whoſe whole fortune amounted to an annuity of L.27 for life, ſhe went, in conſequence of Swift's invitation, to Laracor. With theſe two ladies he paſſed his hours of relaxation, and to them he opened his boſom; but they never reſided in the ſame houſe, nor did he ſee either without a witneſs.

* See Inquiry into the Life of Dean Swift, prefixed to Literary Relics, printed in 1789, for Elliot and Kay.

In 1701 Swift publiſhed A diſcourſe of the conteſts and diſſenſions in Athens and Rome. It was his firſt work, and indeed the only which he ever expreſsly acknowledged. According to his conſtant practice he had concealed his name; but after its appearance, paying a viſit to ſome Iriſh biſhop, he was aſked by him if he had read that pamphlet, and what its reputation was in London. Upon his replying that he believed it was very well liked in London; "Very well liked!" ſaid the biſhop with ſome emotion. "Yes, Sir, it is one of the fineſt tracts that ever was written, and biſhop Burnet is one of the beſt writers in the world." Swift, who always hated Burnet with ſomething more than political rancour, immediately queſtioned his right to the work, when he was told by the biſhop that he was "a young man;" and ſtill perſiſting to doubt of the juſtice of Burnet's claim, on account of the diſſimilarity of the ſtyle of the pamphlet from that of his other works, he was told that he was "a very poſitive young man," as no perſon in England but biſhop Burnet was capable of writing it. Upon which Swift replied, with ſome indignation, I am to aſſure your lordſhip, however, that biſhop Burnet did not write the pamphlet, for I wrote it myſelf. And thus was he forced in the heat of argument to avow what otherwiſe he would have for ever concealed. Swift.

Early in the enſuing ſpring king William died; and Swift, on his next viſit to London found queen Anne upon the throne. It was generally thought, upon this event, that the Tory party would have had the aſcendant: but, contrary to all expectation, the Whigs had managed matters ſo well as to get entirely into the queen's confidence, and to have the whole adminiſtration of affairs in their hands. Swift's friends were now in power; and the Whigs in general, knowing him to be the author of the Diſcourſe on the Conteſts, &c. which was written in defence of king William and his miniſters againſt the violent proceedings of the houſe of commons, conſidered themſelves as much obliged to him, and looked upon him as faſt to their party. But Swift thought with the Whigs only in the ſtate; for with reſpect to the church his principles were always thoſe of a Tory. He therefore declined any intimate connection with the leaders of the party, who at that time profeſſed what was called low church principles. But what above all ſhocked him, ſays Mr Sheridan, was their inviting Deiſts, Freethinkers, Atheiſts, Jews, and Infidels, to be of their party, under pretence of moderation, and allowing a general liberty of conſcience. As Swift was in his heart a man of true religion, he could not have borne, even in his private character, to have mixed with ſuch a motely crew. But when we conſider his principles in his political capacity, that he looked upon the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, to be the main pillar of our newly erected conſtitution, he could not, conſiſtently with the character of a good citizen, join with thoſe who conſidered it more as an ornament than a ſupport to the edifice; and could therefore look on with compoſure while it was undermining, or could even open the gate to a blind multitude, to try, like Sampſon, their ſtrength againſt it, and conſider it only as ſport. With ſuch a party, neither his religious nor political principles would ſuffer him to join; and with regard to the Tories, as is uſual in the violence of factions, they had run into oppoſite extremes, equally dangerous to the ſtate. He was therefore during the earlier part of the queen's reign of no party, but employed himſelf in diſcharging the duties of his function, and in publiſhing from time to time ſuch tracts as he thought might be uſeful. In the year 1704 he publiſhed the Tale of a Tub, which, conſidered merely as a work of genius, is unqueſtionably the greateſt which he ever produced; but the levity with which religion was thought to be there treated, raiſed up enemies to him among all parties, and eventually precluded him from a biſhopric. From that period till the year 1708, he ſeems to have employed himſelf in ſolitary ſtudy; but he then gave ſucceſſively to the public The Sentiments of a Church of England man, the ridicule of aſtrology under the name of Bickerſtaff, the Argument againſt aboliſhing Chriſtianity, and the defence of the Sacramental Teſt.

Soon after began the buſy and important part of Swift's life. He was employed (1710) by the primate of Ireland to ſolicit the queen for a remiſſion of the firſt fruits and twentieth parts to the Iriſh clergy. This introduced him to Mr Harley, afterwards earl of Oxford, who, though a Whig himſelf, was at the head of the Tory miniſtry, and in great need of an auxiliary ſo able as Swift, by whoſe pen he and the other miniſters might be ſupported in pamphlets, poems,

Figure 1: *
Source scan: `page-0257-012cf5a82a33.jpg`

William lordſhip, and ſome time after the great ſeal. Edward being returned to England, after having carried on a very ſucceſsful war in France, found his exchequer in great diſorder. The duke of Lancaſter, one of his ſons, at the head of ſeveral lords, having brought complaints againſt the clergy, who then enjoyed moſt poſts in the kingdom, the king removed them from their employments. But the laymen, who were raiſed to them, behaved ſo ill, that the king was forced to reſtore the eccleſiaſtics. The duke of Lancaſter ſhowed ſtrong animoſity to the clergy, and ſet every engine at work to ruin Wykeham. He impeached him of extortion, and of diſguiſing things, and obliged him to appear at the King's-bench. He got ſuch judges appointed as condemned him; and not ſatisfied with depriving him of all the temporalities of his biſhopric, he adviſed Edward to baniſh him: but this prince rejected the propoſal, and afterward reſtored to Wykeham all that he had been diveſted of. Richard II. was but eleven years old when Edward died: whereby the duke of Lancaſter had an eaſy opportunity of reviving the accuſations againſt the biſhop of Wincheſter: nevertheleſs Wykeham cleared himſelf. Then he founded two noble colleges, the one in Oxford, the other in Wincheſter. Whilſt he was exerting his utmoſt endeavours to improve theſe two fine foundations, he was recalled to court, and in a manner forced to accept of the office of lord high-chancellor in 1389.—Having excellently diſcharged the duties of that employment for three years, he obtained leave to reſign it, foreſeeing the diſturbances that were going to break out. Being returned to his church, he finiſhed his college, and built there ſo magnificent a cathedral, that it almoſt equals that of St Paul's in London. He laid out ſeveral ſums in things advantageous to the public and to the poor; notwithſtanding which, in 1397 he was in great danger; for he and ſome others were impeached of high-treaſon in open parliament: however, he was again fully cleared. From that time till his death he kept quiet in his dioceſe, and there employed himſelf in all the duties of a good prelate. He died in 1404, in the 81ſt year of his age.

William, the name of ſeveral kings of England. See England, n° 87—92, and Britain, n° 302.

Fort-William, a fortreſs in the Highlands of Scotland, erected in king William's reign, as was alſo a ſmall town adjoining, called Maryburgh, in honour of his queen. It is ſituated in Inverneſsſhire, on a narrow arm of the ſea called Loch Eil, which might eaſily, by a very ſhort canal, be united to the Weſtern ſea. Fort-William is of a triangular form, having two baſtions, and is capable of admitting a garriſon of 800 men; but could not be defended againſt an attack, as it is commanded by ſeveral hills in the neighbourhood.

William's Fort, is a factory of Aſia belonging to the Eaſt-India company, ſeated on one of the branches of the river Ganges, in the kingdom of Bengal. The fort was firſt built in the ſhape of an irregular tetragon of brick and mortar; and the town has nothing regular in it, becauſe every one built a houſe as he liked beſt, and for his own conveniency. The governor's houſe is within the fort, and is the beſt piece of architecture in theſe parts. Here there are alſo convenient lodgings for the factors and writers, with ſtore-houſes for the company's goods, and magazines for ammunition. About 50 yards from the fort is the church, built by the charity of merchants reſiding here. The town is called Calcutta, and has a pretty good hoſpital for the ſick, though few come out of it alive. It is governed by a mayor and aldermen, as moſt of the company's factories in the Eaſt Indies now are. In 1757 it was ſurpriſed by the nabob of Bengal, who took it, and put moſt of thoſe that had made reſiſtance into a place called the Black Hole, where moſt of them were ſmothered. This nabob was afterwards killed, and another ſet up in his room, more friendly to the Engliſh; and the factory was re-eſtabliſhed. E. Long. 86. 0. N. Lat. 22. 27.

Sweet-William. See Dianthus.

WILLIAMSBURG, a town of North America, in Virginia, and formerly capital of that ſtate. It is ſituated between two creeks; one falling into James, and the other into York River. The diſtance of each landing place is about a mile from the town, which, with the diſadvantage of not being able to bring up large veſſels, and the want of enterpriſe in the inhabitants, has occaſioned its decay. Here is a college, deſigned for the education of the Indians, but which, on account of their averſion to learning, never anſwered the purpoſe. It is 60 miles eaſt of Richmond. W. Long. 76. 30. N. Lat. 37. 10.

WILLIAMSTADT, a ſea-port town of Holland. It is a handſome ſtrong place, and the harbour is well frequented. It was built by William prince of Orange in 1585; and in 1732 belonged to the ſtadtholder of Frieſland. The river near which it is built is called Butterſlist or Holland Diep; and is one of the bulwarks of the Dutch on the ſide of Brabant, where they always keep a garriſon. This place made a gallant defence in 1793 againſt the French, who were obliged to raiſe the ſiege. It is 15 miles north-eaſt of Bergen-op-Zoom, and 12 ſouth-weſt of Dort. E. Long. 4. 30. N. Lat. 51. 39.

WILLIS (Dr Thomas), a celebrated Engliſh phyſician, was born at Great Bodwin, in Wiltſhire, in 1621, and ſtudied at Chriſt-church college, Oxford. When that city was garriſoned for the king, he, among other ſcholars, bore arms for his Majeſty, and devoted his leiſure hours to the ſtudy of phyſic. The garriſon of Oxford at length ſurrendering to the parliament, he applied himſelf to the practice of his profeſſion; and ſoon rendered himſelf famous by his care and ſkill. He appropriated a room as an oratory for divine ſervice according to the church of England, whither moſt of the loyaliſts in Oxford daily reſorted. In 1660, he became Sedleian profeſſor of natural philoſophy, and the ſame year took the degree of doctor of phyſic. In 1664, he diſcovered the famous medicinal ſpring at Alſtropp, near Brackley. He was one of the firſt members of the Royal Society, and ſoon made his name illuſtrious by his excellent writings. In 1666, after the fire of London, he removed to Weſtminſter; and his practice became greater than that of any of the phyſicians his contemporaries. Soon after his ſettlement in London, his only ſon Thomas falling into a conſumption, he ſent him to Montpelier in France for the recovery of his health; and it proved ſucceſsful. His wife alſo labouring under the ſame diſorder, he offered to leave the town; but ſhe, not ſuffering him to neglect the means of providing for his family, died in 1670. He died at his houſe in St Martin's in 1675, and was buried near her in Weſtminſter-abbey. Dr Willis was extremely modeſt and unambitious, and refuſed the honour of knighthood. He was remarkably pious: As he roſe early in the morning, that he might be preſent at divine ſervice, which he conſtantly frequented before he viſited his patients, he procured prayers to be read beyond the accuſtomed times while he lived; and at his death ſettled a ſtipend of 20l. per annum to continue them. He was a liberal benefactor to the poor wherever he came, having from his early practice allotted part of his profits to charitable uſes. He was exact and regular in all his hours: and though his table was the reſort of moſt of the great men of London, yet he was remarkable

Figure 2: *
Source scan: page-0258-631a7ae7df34.jpg