CH I 671 CHI

Encyclopaedia Britannica (1771)

Historical source

Entry ID: `entry-ch-i-671-chi-1649`
Volume ID: 149978642
Character Count: 8824

Extracted Text

billified themselves in the cultivated provinces of the Chirary, Roman empire is, that their women, contrary to what we and among many other rule nations, were treated with a high degree of refuted. They did not guess 8 rally rise via the men in deeds of values but they share of the animalist them by their exhordiations to diffusion and warn as freedom in the field, and virtue of expertise were evenge the confided with a faced veneration, as endowed with propried powers, capable to forced eternal aid in the form of fluitty, and even to influence the all of the dieties. Hence, though domestic duties were their peculiar province, yet they were not hardly tested the confined to a state of slavery. There appears in died a striking analogy between the condition of the women among the endold dies of Spain and the rank which, they occupied among the warkite cantons of Germany. Perhaps indyed, the Germans were fill more honorable than the Spartan woman, as they were taught to weld the magic weapons of imperfection, which life Greece were propagated to the prefix.

Chiraly, and they extend their influence equally through the whole fyllem. Difference of armour, and different modes of military dielpilings, produce difinition of orders among those who prouddle the anti of war, while other circumburse originating from the false general centes, creation familiar changes to take place amid the political peace.

4. The difine-tion into a direct into the military entity the use of cavalry.

None of the new difinitions which are introduced among men, with respect to the dielpine and con-a few of war on an conference of the acquisition of property and the invention of arts, is more remarkable than that escalated by the use of horse in military expeditions, and the training of them to the exalviations of the military art. Tre-arm, it is true, give to those for are separated with them a greater fa- peritiory over hote to whom their wife is unknown than that the forena maudific or nor him who lights on foot. But the use of fire arms is of fish apartance in war, and the expense attending it is inconfierable, that wherever there had been announced, they have hidden been confirmed to one particular order in an army, and therefore they produce indeed a remarkable, though members, didthisfor among different nations, but thoughtful on permanent difichiers in the armies of any our nation. But to maintain a horse, to equip them with only features, to manage him with dexterity and vigour, are circumstances which have invariably produced as a leading and conspicuous difichiers among the military codes, wherever bodies of cavalry have been formed. The Roman _equities_, who bought became a single a body of uniforms and first generic ones were originally the only body of cavalry employed by the fate, occupied a reputable rank between the femand and the pleaters, and the elegance and humanity of their manners were faithful to their ranks. In ancient Greece, and in the celebrated branches of Asia, the fine dillonline prevailed at a similar period.

Mildar is, functions among the moving German Germans

Another felt worthy of notice reflecting the manera of the batarians of Germany before they cla-

It apposed to, this, in the fourth of Germany at kall, if not in the more northern regions of Alina and Europe, the components of the Roman cons., below, they generated into its province, treated their women with a degree of rejects unknown to small the nation of anonymity; it that the character of the warrior was likewife highly honourable, being under flood to unice all those qualities which were in the highest education, and that it was only at a particular age, and with certain forms, that the youth were admitted to be armra.

When those actions failed from their defects and the names of the theories in the provinces, the change which took habenam place on their circumstances was remarkably and by either they a natural influence, could not but produce an equally fertile a remarkable change on their hiding out and most the romanem. The great outlines might fill remain, but wish gave they could not now find to be filled up in a different tip to chi- manner. Here, however, the records of all delivery arely.

pecially imperfect. We have no Cafar or Tacitus to Reply fields or direct reading at the Gotha nation had not yet returned to read and writes , and the Romans were to depreciled under the finite of their own milties, as to be negligent of the changes which appeared around them. But as foon as the light of bilbery begins again to dawn, we find that the leading courses of the bahacion character were not affected, but only modified in a particular manner, in consequence of their missing among a more pollid people, becoming associated with the theories of life, and acquiring extensive five power and property.

those who fought on horriback now began to be diltingified with peculiar honours. The manners of warrior too were become more cultivate), and his spirit more humain. Lofure and opulence, with the influence of a polibled people, even though in a fate of slavery, taught those habenam to a desire more robust relations and the federal amendments than those who which they had been before fattued with. The influence of birthtime too, which, though grdify co-exist was still immounds to the fiscal lingands of mankind, concurred to polish their manners and dealt their character. Hence, in the end of the tenth and in the beginning of the seventh century, we few Capadocin. lent hands on himself. He is laid to have reigned so years.

On the death of Archdelus, the kingdom of Cappa-docia was reduced to a Roman provinces and governed by thief of the equestrian order. I eveninted subject to the Roman III, the transition of the eastern empire by the Turkse, to whom it is now feligible that has no dilungutifing modern name. In what was an entirely called _Capadocia_, however, the Turkse from four Bogotegheg called Iwasa, _Pritishand, Harigdh_, and _Gegei._ In the time of the Romans, the inhabitants of Capp-padochs bore fo bad a character, and were reputed to vicious and lewd; thus, among the neighbouring as- tions is wicked man was emphatically called a Giga deira. To after ages, however, their lead difodition was to correded and refined by the pure doctrine of Chilihanity, that the country share has had placed greater champions of the Christian religion, or given to the church prelates of more unblimified characters.

We have now no flytlem of the Capadocian laws, and farce whoever shall to form any particular idea of them. As to their customers, we present on a con-fiderable trade in horses, great numbers of which were produced in their country; and are read of these Serripose as frequenting the fans of Tyvo with this commodity. As Capadocia abounded with mines of flyers, lands, rony, and allones, and afforded another one slabatter, ershal, and jolpen, it is probable that they might supply the neighbouring countries with theiré communities.

The religion of the ancient Cappadocians was much the fames within date of the Persian. At Comana there was a rich and clearly tempted declared to Helians whole battles the prieds and their attendants rifled to terrorists on third days, cutting and wounding each other at if faced with an enthusiastic fory. No he famous and magnificent were the temple of Apallo Culanias, and of Jupiter: the half of which had good folks forward or religious warriaries. The shell prick was next in rank to that of Comana) and, according to Simba, had an yearly revenue of y students. Diana Perifer was worshipped in a city called _Capadocia_ where women, devoted to the worship of that goldofis, were reported to read barberfooted on burning coal, without receiving any burial. The context of Dimas di Diopolis, and of Arias at Zels, were likewise held in great westernism both by the Cappadocians and Armo- nians, who blocked to them from all parts. In the latter were rendered all costs in interest of conferences and the chief among the pride was now anyway inferior in digitiry power and wealth, to any in the kingdoms having a royal attendance, and an unlimited authority over all like differing formats and offices of the temple. The Romans, who willingly adopted all the fingerti- ritions and hyperditious rice of the nations they conquered greatly traveled to the venues of this and so that temples is conferring the pretilhood on fish as they thought not fit for carrying out their adigame. We see told that Indian families were offered at Co- mans ; and that this barharous cutom was brought by Qrcites and his filter Iphigenis from Tauries Seytica, where men and women were immolized to Diana. But this culture, if ever it obtained in Cappadocia, was a- bolited in the times of the Romans.

Carpaana

Matched Wikipedia Article

Title: Chi-won
Page ID: 37627410
Revision ID: 1312034258
URL: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Chi-won

Source record

- Dataset: NationalLibraryOfScotland/encyclopaedia_britannica_illustrated
- Dataset Revision: 309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443
- Page ID: britannica:309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443:train:1649
  Filename: page-1649-e6a1fc569876.jpg
  Row Index: 1649
  SHA256: e6a1fc5698767dd4...
- Page ID: britannica:309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443:train:1670
  Filename: page-1670-ced69857efba.jpg
  Row Index: 1670
  SHA256: ced69857efbaddd7...

Chivalry.

and they extend their influence equally through the whole system. Difference of armour, and different modes of military discipline, produce distinction of orders among those who practise the arts of war; while other circumstances, originating from the same general causes, occasion similar changes to take place amid the scenes of peace.

6. The distinction introduced into the military order by the use of cavalry.

None of the new distinctions which are introduced among men, with respect to the discipline and conduct of war, in consequence of the acquisition of property and the invention of arts, is more remarkable than that occasioned by the use of horses in military expeditions, and the training of them to the evolutions of the military art. Fire-arms, it is true, give to those who are acquainted with them a greater superiority over those to whom their use is unknown than what the horseman possesses over him who fights on foot. But the use of fire-arms is of such importance in war, and the expence attending it so inconsiderable, that wherever these have been introduced, they have seldom been confined to one particular order in an army; and therefore they produce indeed a remarkable, though transient, distinction among different nations; but establish no permanent distinctions in the armies of any one nation. But to maintain a horse, to equip him with costly furniture, to manage him with dexterity and vigour, are circumstances which have invariably produced a standing and conspicuous distinction among the military order, wherever bodies of cavalry have been formed. The Roman equites, who, though they became at length a body of usurers and farmers general, were originally the only body of cavalry employed by the state, occupied a respectable rank between the senators and the plebeians; and the elegance and humanity of their manners were suitable to their rank. In ancient Greece, and in the celebrated monarchies of Asia, the same distinction prevailed at a similar period.

7. Military distinctions among the ancient Germans.

Since the circumstances and principles on which this distinction depends are not such as must be confined in their influence to one particular nation, or one region of the globe, we may hope to trace their effects among the savage warriors of Scythia and Germany, as well as among the Greeks or Romans. From the valuable treatise of Tacitus de moribus Germanorum, we learn, that among the German warriors a distinction somewhat of this nature did actually subsist; not so much indeed a distinction between the warrior who fought on horseback and those who fought on foot, as between those whom vigour of body and energy of mind enabled to brave all the dangers of war, and such as, from the imbecility of youth, the infirmities of age, or the natural inferiority of their mental and bodily powers, were unequal to scenes of hardship and deeds of valour. The youth was not permitted to take arms and join his warlike countrymen in their military expeditions whenever he himself thought proper. There was a certain age before which he could not be invested with armour. When he had attained that period, if not found deficient in strength, activity, or courage, he was formally honoured with the shield and the lance, called to the duties, and admitted to all the privileges, of a warrior.

Another fact worthy of notice respecting the manners of the barbarians of Germany before they established themselves in the cultivated provinces of the Roman empire is, that their women, contrary to what we find among many other rude nations, were treated with an high degree of respect. They did not generally vie with the men in deeds of valour, but they animated them by their exhortations to distinguish themselves in the field; and virgins especially were considered with a sacred veneration, as endowed with prophetic powers, capable to foresee events hid in the womb of futurity, and even to influence the will of the deities. Hence, though domestic duties were their peculiar province, yet they were not harshly treated nor confined to a state of slavery. There appears indeed a striking analogy between the condition of the women among the rude soldiers of Sparta and the rank which they occupied among the warlike cantons of Germany. Perhaps, indeed, the German were still more honourable than the Spartan women; as they were taught to wield the magic weapons of superstition, which in Greece were appropriated to the priests.

Chivalry.

8. Respectability of the women among the Germans.

It appears, therefore, that, in the forests of Germany at least, if not in the more northern regions of Asia and Europe, the conquerors of the Roman empire, before they penetrated into its provinces, treated their women with a degree of respect unknown to most of the nations of antiquity; that the character of the warrior was likewise highly honourable, being understood to unite all those qualities which were in the highest estimation; and that it was only at a particular age, and with certain forms, that the youth were admitted to bear arms.

9. Changes in the manners of the barbarians after they settled in the Roman empire, which gave rise to chivalry.

When those nations sallied from their deserts and forests, over-ran the Roman empire, and established themselves in its provinces, the change which took place on their circumstances was remarkable; and by a natural influence, it could not but produce an equally remarkable change on their habits, customs, and manners. The great outlines might still remain; but they could not now fail to be filled up in a different manner. Here, however, the records of history are peculiarly imperfect. We have no Cæsar or Tacitus to supply facts or direct our reasonings; the Gothic nations had not yet learned to read and write; and the Romans were so depressed under the sense of their own miseries, as to be negligent of the changes which happened around them. But as soon as the light of history begins again to dawn, we find that the leading features of the barbarian character were not effaced, but only modified in a particular manner, in consequence of their mixing among a more polished people, becoming acquainted with the luxuries of life, and acquiring extensive power and property.

Those who fought on horseback now began to be distinguished with peculiar honours. The manners of the warrior too were become more cultivated, and his spirit more humane. Leisure and opulence, with the influence of a polished people, even though in a state of slavery, taught those barbarians to aspire after more refined pleasures and more splendid amusements than those which they had been before satisfied with. The influence of Christianity too, which, though grossly corrupted, was still favourable to the social happiness of mankind, concurred to polish their manners and exalt their character. Hence, in the end of the tenth and in the beginning of the eleventh century, we see lent hands on himſelf. He is ſaid to have reigned 50 years.

Figure 1: *
Source scan: page-1649-e6a1fc569876.jpg

Cappadocia.

On the death of Archelaus, the kingdom of Cappadocia was reduced to a Roman province, and governed by thoſe of the equeſtrian order. It continued ſubject to the Romans till the invaſion of the eaſtern empire by the Turks, to whom it is now ſubject, but has no diſtinguiſhing modern name. In what was anciently called Cappadocia, however, the Turks have four Beglerbeglics, called Siwas, Trebizond, Maraſch, and Cogni.

In the time of the Romans, the inhabitants of Cappadocia bore ſo bad a character, and were reputed ſo vicious and lewd, that, among the neighbouring nations, a wicked man was emphatically called a Cappadocian. In after ages, however, their lewd diſpoſition was ſo corrected and reſtrained by the pure doctrines of Chriſtianity, that no country whatever has produced greater champions of the Chriſtian religion, or given to the church prelates of more unblemiſhed characters.

We have now no ſyſtem of the Cappadocian laws, and ſcarce wherewithal to form any particular idea of them. As to their commerce, they carried on a conſiderable trade in horſes, great numbers of which were produced in their country; and we read of them in Scripture as frequenting the fairs of Tyre with this commodity. As Cappadocia abounded with mines of ſilver, braſs, iron, and alum, and afforded great ſtore of alabaſter, cryſtal, and jaſper, it is probable that they might ſupply the neighbouring countries with theſe commodities.

The religion of the ancient Cappadocians was much the ſame with that of the Perſians. At Comana there was a rich and ſtately temple dedicated to Bellona; whoſe battles the prieſts and their attendants uſed to repreſent on ſtated days, cutting and wounding each other as if ſeized with an enthuſiaſtic fury. No leſs famous and magnificent were the temples of Apollo Catanius, and of Jupiter: the laſt of which had 3000 ſacred ſervants, or religious votaries. The chief prieſt was next in rank to that of Comana; and, according to Strabo, had an yearly revenue of 15 talents. Diana Perſica was worſhipped in a city called Caſtaballo, where women, devoted to the worſhip of that goddeſs, were reported to tread barefooted on burning coals, without receiving any hurt. The temples of Diana at Dioſpolis, and of Anias at Zela, were likewiſe held in great veneration both by the Cappadocians and Armenians, who flocked to them from all parts. In the latter were tendered all oaths in matters of conſequence; and the chief among the prieſts was no way inferior in dignity, power, and wealth, to any in the kingdom; having a royal attendance, and an unlimited authority over all the inferior ſervants and officers of the temple. The Romans, who willingly adopted all the ſuperſtitions and ſuperſtitious rites of the nations they conquered, greatly increaſed the revenues of this and other temples; conferring the prieſthood on ſuch as they thought moſt fit for carrying on their deſigns.—We are told that human ſacrifices were offered at Comana; and that this barbarous cuſtom was brought by Oreſtes and his ſiſter Iphigenia from Taurica Scythica, where men and women were immolated to Diana. But this cuſtom, if ever it obtained in Cappadocia, was aboliſhed in the times of the Romans. Cappanus || Capra.

CAPPANUS, a name given by ſome authors to a worm that adheres to and gnaws the bottoms of ſhips; to which it is extremely pernicious, eſpecially in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies: to prevent this, ſeveral ſhips have lately been ſheathed with copper; the firſt trial of which was made on his majeſty's frigate the Alarm.

CAPPARIS, in botany: A genus of the monogynia order, belonging to the polyandria claſs of plants; and in the natural method ranking under the 25th order, Putaminea. The calyx is tetraphyllous and coriaceous; there petals are four; the ſtamina are long; the fruit is a berry, carnous, unilocular, and pedunculated, or furniſhed with a foot-ſtalk.

There are ſeven ſpecies. The ſpinoſa, or common caper, is a low ſhrub, generally growing out of the joints of old walls, the fiſſures of rocks, and amongſt rubbiſh, in moſt of the warm parts of Europe: it hath woody ſtalks, which ſend out many lateral ſlender branches; under each of theſe are placed two ſhort crooked ſpines, between which and the branches come out the footſtalks of the leaves, which are ſingle, ſhort, and ſuſtain a round ſmooth entire leaf. At the intermediate joints, between the branches, come out the flowers on long footſtalks; before theſe expand, the bud with the empalement is gathered for pickling. Theſe which are laſt expand in form of a ſingle roſe, having five large white petals, which are roundiſh and concave; in the middle are placed a great number of long ſtamina, ſurrounding a ſtyle which riſes above them, and crowned with an oval germen, which afterwards becomes a capſule filled with kidney-ſhaped ſeeds.

Culture. This plant is very difficultly preſerved in Britain: it delights to grow in crevices of rocks, old walls, &c. and always thrives beſt in an horizontal poſture; ſo that, when planted either in pots or in the full ground, they ſeldom thrive, though they may be kept alive for ſome years. They are propagated by ſeeds in the warm parts of Europe, but very ſeldom in Britain.

Uſes. The buds, pickled with vinegar, &c. are brought to Britain annually from Italy and the Mediterranean. They are ſuppoſed to excite appetite and aſſiſt digeſtion; and to be particularly uſeful as detergents and aperients in obſtructions of the liver and ſpleen.

CAPRA, or GOAT, a genus of quadrupeds belonging to the order of pecora. The horns are hollow, turned upwards, erect, and ſcabrous. There are eight fore-teeth in the under jaw, and none in the upper; and they have no dog-teeth. This genus conſiſts of 14 ſpecies, viz. Plates CXXI, CXXII, CXXIII, CXXIV.

I. The HIRCUS, or common goat, with arched carinated horns, and a long beard. It is a native of the eaſtern mountains.

The goat is an animal of more ſagacity than the ſheep. Inſtead of having an antipathy at mankind, they voluntarily mingle with them, and are eaſily tamed. Even in uninhabited countries, they betray no ſavage diſpoſitions. In the year 1698, an Engliſh veſſel having put in to the iſland of Bonavilla, two negroes came aboard, and offered gratis to the captain as many