Part III

Encyclopaedia Britannica (1771)

Historical source

Entry ID: `entry-part-iii-1933`
Volume ID: 144850379
Character Count: 4212

Extracted Text

O R A T O R Y.

firedy temper of the family. And fo in the pro- verbal exprion: _An ape is an ape, drift him ever_ _fo fine._

floretion

When a word is repeated again with vehemence in the fane feen, it is called _epizensis_ This figure flews the carefulness of the freaker, and his great concern of mind about what he fears and therefore has a natural tendency to exercise the attention of the audience. It is fuited to exprets anger, furprizes, forrow, and fe- veral other affiliates. As when Cicero would experts his indignation against Anthony for having been the chief instrument in bringing on the civil war, he fays to him: _You, you, Authorism pulled Defer upon the_ court issue. It was that he tells Crafting in his first direc- tive against him : _You lives; and live, not to lay afide_, _but to paying your racked defying._ And when our Sa- viour would expect his great concern and former for the wandche of the Jews, he does it in this pathetic manner: _O Jernjalem, Jerjalem, who kilitl the pro-_ _phs!_.

90
73
70

and your ancestors have undergone the greatest la-Blocution boats?

Epifrephe, is contrary to the former, and makes the repetitions at the end of each member or feneen. As thus: _Ruse concord was left, friendship was left,_ _fidelity was left, liberty was left, all was left_. And Cicero, in the charge which she brings against Mark Authority before the feature, makes life of this figure, when he fays, " Do you lament the deltruth of three Roman amics" The author of this detective was Anthony. Do you bewah the loaf of most emi- ent citizens? They have been taken from you by An- thony. Is the authority of this order weakened? It is weekend by Anthony.

_Sympleces_ takes in both thefele fat figures. As in that of Cicero: " You would patted and assume him, whom the female bath condemned, whom the people of Kome have condemned; whom all mankind have con- demend?" Here the feveral members both begin and end with the famed. We have a beautiful in- Bance of in St Raul, when he fays: " Are they Hebrews? Io am I. Are they fireliter? Io am L. Are they the feet of Abraham ? Io am I. Are they the best of Abraham ? Go am I.

Where fenestens could wish the word with which it began, it is called _spanialphs_. As in that expreftion of Phants, ń Virte comans all things, he wanna no good thing who like virtue." The figure is the fame, but the principle not fo honeln, in the advice which we find given by the-miler in Horos, when he fays, " Get money if you can, possibly, but however, get money." This figure adds a force to an expref- tion, when the principal thing designed to be courvye- ed is thus repeated, by being it fall upon the mind. And it begins the beauty of it, when the fenestone has an agreeable turn arising from two opposite parts. As in Cicero's commenting Cofar: " We have few your colony remained by the way, your own lived in the city we have not femen." Hermogenes calls this * circle, because the fenestence returna on the fame work, as that converted figure is form- ed by the orbicular motion of a line to the fame points.

When the following fenestene begins with the fam word with which the former concluded, it is termed anadbigfix. As in the following influence: _Let us_ _think to price too good for truth y forth cannot be_ _bought too dies._ So in that suffage of St John: He come to his own, and his own received him not. This figure generally fits belt with grave and folemn dif- counter.

_Epandas_, is the freedom of a fenestor, or repeat- ing in backwares, fo that it is taken in the two half fa- gerets for it both begins and ends with the fame words, and the fame word is likewise repeated in the middle. That term of preffin both beauty traits, and flews arees- dirafs of thought. We have the following example of is la Minutus Feliss, where he is exopling the folly of the Egyptian fapetdition. " Ida (fay fys) with Cy- mosphalus and her priefs, lemons, bemanns, and fcks her loft for, jer strenians beat their breatls, and insure the grief of the unhappy mother; in a little time the four is found, upon which they all re- pieces. War do they excel every year to lafe what they find, or to find what they lole. And is it not ri-

Matched Wikipedia Article

Title: Part Three
Page ID: 5134134
Revision ID: 1319712171
URL: `https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Part_Three`

Source record

- Dataset: `NationalLibraryOfScotland/encyclopaedia_britannica_illustrated`
- Dataset Revision: `309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443`
- Page ID: `britannica:309f765b1ecc83e0a7f7762e44b4a927a7555443:train:1933`
  Filename: `page-1933-ae507137e9dc.jpg`
  Row Index: 1933
  SHA256: `ae507137e9dccc05...`

Elocution. steady temper of the family. And so in the proverbial expression: An ape is an ape, dress him ever so fine.

68 When a word is repeated again with vehemence in the same sense, it is called epizeuxis. This figure shews the earnestness of the speaker, and his great concern of mind about what he says; and therefore has a natural tendency to excite the attention of the audience. It is suited to express anger, surprize, sorrow, and several other passions. As when Cicero would express his indignation against Anthony for having been the chief instrument in bringing on the civil war, he says to him: You, you, Anthony, pushed Cæsar upon the civil war. And thus he tells Catiline in his first invective against him: You live; and live, not to lay aside, but to pursue, your wicked design. And when our Saviour would express his great concern and sorrow for the wickedness of the Jews, he does it in this pathetic manner: O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, who killest the prophets!

69 Climax, is a beautiful kind of repetition, when the word, which ends the first member of a period, begins the second, and so through each member, till the whole is finished. There is a great deal of strength as well as beauty in this figure, where the several steps rise naturally, and are closely connected with each other. As in this example: There is no enjoyment of property without government, no government without a magistrate, no magistrate without obedience, and no obedience where every one acts as he pleases. But, as Quintilian observes, this figure lies so open, that it is apt to look too much like art; for which reason he advises not to use it often. To prevent this, therefore, orators sometimes disguise it, by not repeating the same word which stood in the former member, but some other equivalent to it. As in the following instance of Cicero for Milo: "Nor did he commit himself only to the people, but also to the senate; nor to the senate only, but likewise to the public forces; nor to these only, but also to his power with whom the senate had entrusted the whole commonwealth."

70 When several sentences, or members of a sentence, begin with the same word, it is called anaphora. This is a lively and elegant figure, and serves very much to engage the attention. For by the frequent return of the same word the mind of the hearer is held in an agreeable suspence, till the whole is finished. "You do nothing, (says Cicero to Catiline,) you attempt nothing, you think nothing, but what I not only hear, but also see, and plainly perceive." It is frequently used by way of question; which renders it not only beautiful, but likewise strong and nervous. As at the beginning of the same speech: "Does neither the night-guard of the palace, nor the city-watch, nor the peoples fear, nor the agreement of all good men, nor the meeting of the senate in this fortified place, nor the countenances and looks of this assembly, at all move you?" And in another of his orations: "What is so popular as peace, which seems to afford a pleasure, not only to beings endowed with sense, but even to inanimate nature? What is so popular as liberty, which even beasts as well as men seem to covet and prefer above all things? What is so popular as ease and leisure, for the enjoyment of which you and your ancestors have undergone the greatest labours?" Elocution.

Epistrophe, is contrary to the former, and makes 71
the repetition at the end of each member or sentence. As thus: Since concord was lost, friendship was lost, fidelity was lost, liberty was lost, all was lost. And Cicero, in the charge which he brings against Mark Anthony before the senate, makes use of this figure, when he says, "Do you lament the destruction of three Roman armies? The author of that destruction was Anthony. Do you bewail the loss of most eminent citizens? They have been taken from you by Anthony. Is the authority of this order weakened? It is weakened by Anthony."

Symploce takes in both these last figures. As in that 72 of Cicero: "You would pardon and acquit him, whom the senate hath condemned, whom the people of Rome have condemned; whom all mankind have condemned." Here the several members both begin and end with the same word. We have a beautiful instance of it in St Paul, when he says: "Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I."

When a sentence concludes with the word with which 73
it began, it is called epanalepsis. As in that expression of Plautus, "Virtue contains all things, he wants no good thing who has virtue." The figure is the same, but the principle not so honest, in the advice which we find given by the miser in Horace, when he says, "Get money if you can, honestly; but however, get money." This figure adds a force to an expression, when the principal thing designed to be conveyed is thus repeated, by leaving it last upon the mind. And it heightens the beauty of it, when the sentence has an agreeable turn arising from two opposite parts. As in Cicero's compliment to Cæsar: "We have seen your victory terminated by the war; your drawn sword in the city we have not seen." Hermogenes calls this a circle, because the sentence returns again to the same word, as that geometrical figure is formed by the orbicular motion of a line to the same point.

When the following sentence begins with the same 74 word with which the former concluded, it is termed anadiplosis. As in the following instance: Let us think no price too great for truth; truth cannot be bought too dear. So in that passage of St John: He came to his own, and his own received him not. This figure generally suits best with grave and solemn discourses.

Epanodos, is the inversion of a sentence, or repeat- 75
ing it backwards, so that it takes in the two last figures; for it both begins and ends with the same word, and the same word is likewise repeated in the middle. This turn of expression has a beauty in it, and shews a readiness of thought. We have the following example of it in Minutius Felix, where he is exposing the folly of the Egyptian superstition. "Isis (says he) with Cynocephalus and her priests, laments, bemoans, and seeks her lost son; her attendants beat their breasts, and imitate the grief of the unhappy mother; in a little time the son is found, upon which they all rejoice. Nor do they cease every year to lose what they find, or to find what they lose. And is it not ridi-

Figure 1: *
Source scan: page-1933-ae507137e9dc.jpg